"I can't Get the Sieep out of Me."

"I cannot get the sleep out of me," he explained to the Journal reporter wio at 9.30 a.m. had invaded the parlor.

The strains of "The Star Spangled Banner" were wafted across the waters from the Camard dock and on deck men—Americans and foreigners—were raising their caps in aghite.

Sloan, jockey, nibbled another biscult.

"That's for Palmer, the puglist," he drawled. 'How those people do rush up on deck when we near shore! How they rash to the cabin to get their customs affairs over! I always wait until the rush is over, I don't like to get up early."

He patted the pretty gown and ran his fingers caressingly through his hair.

He stared with amazement when Sloane was surrounded on the Cunard pler by a horde of reporters. Wille photographers capped shots at the jockey from every vandage point.

"This is the most remarkable scene I ever witnessed," he said to a Journal reporter. "I never saw such a thing abroad, Why, the London papers don't do things that way.

"Before we got within several miles of the landing a Journal reporter popped over the vessel a side and interviewed every one on board, and now, as soon as we get ashore, we find a crowd of other reporters awaiting us. It's a wonderful sight."

WITH the grace of a leading lady Tod Sloan recilined on the conch of his parlor in one of the finest suites on the Cunarder Campania and sipped his morning corec.

His long black hair was facty topsied and made a charming frame for his pale young face. His siender form was encased in a striped morning robe of quilt design. From the deck above came the noise of many feet as a half-thousand persons tramped impatiently up and down to catch through the for the first glimpse of New York City-fiot a trile away.

In that anxious crowd were a United States Senator, members of the English nobility, army officers, strangers anxious for a sight of a respected land, and Angelesia.

"I shall go very soon to Saratoga to meet Mr. Sloiney Paget and arrange with him to ride for Mr. William O. Whitney in England. It has studied the hard, cold, torturing trusses with the steel or iron spring. and it has produced a soft, gentle, yet always effective appliance called the Improved Elastic Truss, one of which is worth a dozen of the others. It is truly a scientific discovery, for this truss cures, and it cures without pain. It brings relief to man, woman and child.

It is universally recommended by intelligent physicians. For Rupture it has come to be known as an almost infallible cure. It acts where other trusses talk.

Any way you look at it, Rupture is a dangerous thing. Even if discouragement has made you sceptical, you owe it to yourself to investigate anything which could possibly give you relief. Now, you will not investigate the Improved Elastic Truss in vain—nobody has
